Old Gregory.

Old Gregory stood on a rising ground, And, viewing the country spread around, Said, "I'm worth a hundred thousand pound!" His ample wealth had increased of late,

The cash at his banker's was growing great, And he had just purchased a vast estate. 'We must look to these cots to-morrow morn; They obstruct the view from my elegant lawn; I'll sow the spot where they stand with corn!" Then the kind old steward shook his head,-"And all those who toil for their bread, Where will they hide their heads?" he said.

They may hide their heads where they please for me; "And yonder rickety, clackety mill,

That grinds and groans at the toot of the hill, "But the mill was built before you was born, And where will the villagers grind their corn?" "They may grind where they will for me; All that is their business!" said Gregory.

Jolly old Gregory supped very late, He drank of the best, of the choicest he ate. His soul was contented, his heart was elate. Then he took his usual nap in his chair, Of an unexpectant visitant there, Unaware indeed! He is slumbering still

And the cottagers never shall dread his will! And I fear the villagers laughed with glee, That Death had "business" with Gregory.
